Farnesyltransferase inhibitors: a new class of anticancer agents. The transfer of the farnesyl group to cysteine residue at the C-terminus of the Ras oncoprotein is a pre-requisite for correct biological activity of Ras. Farnesyltransferase (FTase) has become a target for anticancer therapy. Two classes of FTase inhibitors have been developed: farnesyl pyrophosphate (FPP) analogues and heterocyclic farnesyl-methyltransferase (FHMT) inhibitors. Both classes have shown interesting anticancer activity in vivo against several types of tumour cells, either as single agents or in combination with cytotoxic drugs. This review is an update of the most recent findings on the design and pharmacological activity of these two classes of FTase inhibitors. Moreover, the article is divided into two main sections, one focusing on the pharmacological characteristics of FTase inhibitors, and another presenting the anticancer activity of these agents. Finally, possible mechanisms underlying the anticancer activity of FTase inhibitors are discussed. Stubbed
