Okeoke.Net is a music player for serious people! Features: * Track and video-file support * Playlist support * Audio and video tag support * Artist support * User-friendly interface What's New: 1. Fixes compatibility issues with NIST library 2. Added new karaoke track option (compatibility with the new 'karaoke' album). Ahead to the Windows 8 event in New York later this month, Microsoft is moving to bring some of its big, pre-Windows 8 apps to Windows Phone as well. The company has just made Twitter and Facebook available on the iPhone, Android, and Windows Phones, so it's time for their Windows Phone counterparts to make good on their launch date. Microsoft should've really been ashamed of how it handled the release of Silverlight 4 and how it made users wait and wait for it to arrive in a way that few had any reason to want it or need it. They've taken that experience away from Windows Phone and are working their way to release apps that should've made it there a long time ago. Facebook With Facebook finally out of beta, it's now one of the more common apps you'll find on any Windows Phone, even if you're not a Facebook user. You can sign up to get basic information back, including your favorite people, friends, and your newest added friends. (Go ahead and try it out to see what you can find on your own.) The Bing-powered app shows you a brief feed of the latest posts and pages, and in case you want to click through and read a message from a friend, there's a link to the app itself. Twitter Twitter is still the social media app that people keep going back to, and with good reason. The latest version of the app isn't exactly a freebie, but it has plenty of features and settings to make it worthwhile. You'll find a basic timeline that shows the latest tweets from your friends and accounts you follow. You can also dig a little deeper and see just your latest tweets, or tweets by individual users. You can make it easier to scan the tweets you've read, instead of just scrolling through a timeline that gets sparser and sparser as you scroll. Of course, there's a link in the app for everyone who wants to sign up for an aa67ecbc25
