We can also group the religions we have studied into one of the two broad groups we identified in previous chapters: organized and non-organized religion. The Japanese religious affiliation of imperial subjects was flexible and situational, more so than the Buddhist, Christian, or Shinto worlds. Women, irrespective of their level of education, were often active in Buddhist ritual, Confucianism, and in the national shrine-going culture. The Shinto kami generally belonged to the imperial family. Subjects who were not of the emperor, or who held estates in the outer provinces, were often required to profess a particular faith. Different rites, ceremonies, and even conversion
