However, because their income is limited, they are trying to postpone the purchase of the home. I'd like to give them some advice, though: I've known them for a few years and the family has always been quite open about the need to save. And they are doing that - which is great. There has never been a significant reduction in their spending or their income, so they have a comfortable nest egg. However, because the economy sucks and inflation is high, they are now having trouble finding a mortgage on a home which is comfortable enough for their "after-resume" (on which you write you have an amazing number of years of work experience after retirement). (They have lost jobs, and their spouse has had to start a new career in another city) So what should they do? Should they keep investing and also invest more to reduce the amount of the home's purchase price? Or should they suck it up and look for a comfortable home later? Also, should they invest to make the most money in the short-term and keep a few extra dollars for the long-term (buyer's market
