The design goal of AutoCAD is to provide functionality comparable to that of the leading CAD applications in the commercial market while maintaining the price point of a desktop design program. AutoCAD was designed to be easier to use than a traditional CAD system, with the user interface being considered to be intuitive. To achieve this, many of the features of AutoCAD are based on principles of human perception and cognition, such as the flow of information from the user to the application, rather than relying on the application to be based on strict programming techniques and artificial intelligence. In addition to traditional 2D drafting and modeling, AutoCAD offers 3D modeling capabilities, including surface and solid modeling, multi-viewing, and rendering. AutoCAD does not use a wireframe system, so there are no coordinate axis that run throughout the 3D space. Instead, each 3D object is an independent 3D entity in which the coordinates are local to the object. The dimensions of each object are also local to the object. AutoCAD can create its own coordinate system, however, an object can also be placed within a 3D space in which the three axes are defined by external sources such as a UCS. In this case, the object would be 3D relative to the UCS. AutoCAD is capable of a broad range of customization, including automatic control over parts of the user interface, customization of data objects, custom labeling of objects, custom tools, and custom toolbars. AutoCAD can import and export data in many formats. The program has extensive tool palettes and is able to customize tool palettes, change the palette color, and arrange objects in palettes and toolbars. AutoCAD is organized into three main categories: Object creation, editing, and presentation. Object creation involves creating new objects, modifying existing objects, and modifying existing drawings. Editing includes editing existing objects, including changing their properties, properties, and dimensions, modifying existing drawings, moving and copying objects, and specifying object constraints. Presentation involves preparing drawings, including viewing and working on drawings. The interface between the AutoCAD application and the user was designed with four major user goals in mind: efficiency, utility, simplicity, and personalization. In this way, the user interface of AutoCAD was designed to be more efficient than other design programs and to be more user-friendly. This, in turn, results in a more productive design session. The program's efficiency is defined by its
