Earlier today, Nvidia CEO Jen-Hsun Huang shared a new slide of the Titan V on stage during a press conference in the Dallas video game trade show. While it may lack the presence of AMD's new Turing based RX 5500 series of graphics cards, the Titan V is offered at a higher MSRP of $1,200 (£1,200) or $1,000 (£1,000) if it is bundled with a Titan XD graphics card. This is the Titan V's final MSRP before the card hits retail in November and it comes with 12GB of GDDR6 memory and a 14nm GPU. The Titan V features 12GB of GDDR6 memory along with a full array of Nvidia's Pascal graphics processors. This setup allows the Titan V to hit 4,096 CUDA cores along with 144 texture mapping units and 48 ROPs to power out over 28 TFLOPS of graphics processing performance. This is similar to the Titan X Pascal where the graphics card had 12GB of GDDR5 memory, a base clock of 1,000MHz while the boost clock maxed out at 1,150MHz. It also has a feature called NV Link, allowing gamers to connect two Titan V graphics cards to each other in SLI mode. They can also connect the Titan V graphics card to the Titan XD card in dual-fan cooling configuration. Nvidia also included a switchable full-array LED backlight for an extra glow. The Titan V has Nvidia's latest NN (Nyquist Noise) and TU104 GPU chip that features 2560 CUDA cores and an 11GB of GDDR6 memory. The Titan V also has Nvidia's new Dynamic Super Resolutions, which automatically scale up and down the display to a higher refresh rate to improve gaming performance. It will come with a removable backplate as well. The Titan V is 20 percent faster than the Titan X Pascal, but it comes at a higher cost. The Titan V also has a price 6d1f23a050
